Inguinal lymphadenitis and systemic fibrosis (pyoderma-like) are common sequelae of 'pustular' contact dermatitis in guinea pigs, which has been noted to be more prevalent in females than males. The fibrotic response observed in guinea pigs following pustular contact dermatitis is a consequence of a disturbance of the immunological control of the inflammatory response. In this investigation, we have attempted to localise the site of antigen presentation to lymphocytes and macrophages in the skin of female guinea pigs. Further, we investigated whether topical application of the lymphotoxin inducing agent, bleomycin, in the pustular contact dermatitis model could promote chronic fibrosis following pustule closure. A marked increase in collagen deposition was noted within the subepidermal space of the guinea pig skin following 2-4 bleomycin treatments (1 mg/ml in 0.1 per cent bleomycin 2 per cent paraffin; twice a week for 6 weeks). The fibrotic response observed was anatomically similar to the fibrotic response which has been reported following repeated application of topical 2 per cent sulphur in female guinea pigs, and was accompanied by a partial loss of lymphocytes in the infiltrated dermis and a complete loss of circulating lymphocytes. It was not possible to relate collagen deposition to bleomycin-induced guinea pig pustulosis.mana lõpetamiseks 2009. aastal, loodan, et Rumeenia saab oma järgmise kolme aasta jooksul siduda väiksema hooajatõusuga täiendavaid soodsaid sid d41b202975
