Evaluation of the role of emergency coronary angiography in patients with acute coronary syndrome. The authors analysed diagnostic and therapeutic data of 1577 patients (1339 men) aged from 21 to 90 years (mean age 65 years) with clinical symptoms of acute coronary syndrome (ACS) who were admitted to the Cardiological Clinic of the Russian Research Institute of Emergency Care. The study group included 927 patients with ACS of non-coronary origin. ACS of non-coronary origin was most often presented by a cardiogenic shock in cases of acute myocardial infarction (AMI) (88.6%), unstable angina pectoris (UAP) (35.4%) and unstable angina in form of an unstable angina (UAP) (27.5%). Coronarography was performed in the overall group of patients (n=927, 62.6%). Only in 350 patients (37.4%) no vascular pathology was found, which indicates the need for further cardiac catheterization. Coronarography was most often performed in patients with acute myocardial infarction in cases of AMI (68.1%) and unstable angina in form of unstable angina (UA) (60%). Coronarography was the method of choice in 231 patients with UA (66.6%), in 92 patients with UAP (57.1%). Coronarography was not performed at all in 194 patients with AMI (15.3%). Correct diagnosis of ACS and definition of further cardiosurgical and medical treatment was only possible in 45% of patients with 0cc13bf012
