Or will he give up? JUST WATCHED 'I don't think I'll be able to get a job': Hugo's struggle MUST WATCH JUST WATCHED Compassion for Hugo Chavez MUST WATCH Compassion for Hugo Chavez 02:06 By the time it is done, the prime minister's optimistic prediction, that "there will be no more shortages, no more inflation," will have been proven wrong. He's frustrated. "We will have to change the methods," he told CNN, noting that government's plan is to avoid paying more than 50 cents per gallon for subsidized gasoline and to make buses and trucks in Venezuela free, at least for the first 20 kilometers of travel, which covers most of the country. "The government is faced with such a serious problem," he says, "that there are people living in misery, and there are people who are so rich that they can do whatever they want." In a country where the national minimum wage is about one-tenth of a U.S. dollar a month, where the streets are regularly flooded, and where inflation touches 40 percent a month, Venezuelans know well that oil money is their only salvation. And there's no end in sight. But even with a record price of $156.60 a barrel, Venezuela is sitting on an estimated 3.1 billion barrels of oil, with experts saying there are probably 5.4 billion more in reserve. So the government is willing to endure shortages as it tries to make the economy work. As for the leader himself, he's following the advice of his economic team, which is developing a strategy to help Venezuela fend off international and domestic pressure to change leadership. The plan for Hugo Chavez, the plan for Chavez There is talk of presidential elections next year. But if there is an election, Chavez's plan is that he'll be the candidate again. He is likely to win in that scenario. Chavez is likely to be declared the winner of a vote set for December 6. The day before was the last day of voting, and observers from the leftist ALBA political coalition said it had no problems with the vote and was widely observed.
