Bidirectional metastasis of head and neck squamous cell carcinoma (HNSCC) to regional lymph nodes and distant organs is frequent. Current studies elucidated HNSCC cell dissemination by the help of molecular markers as well as by models of cancer cell migration. We determined the invasive character of HNSCC cells using an in vitro transwell-type cell migration assay. Using this method, we demonstrated high invasive abilities of HNSCC cell lines representing the different entities of HNSCC and one normal keratinocyte line. [The effect of nitric oxide donors on the heart of experimental hibernator and nonhibernator rodents]. The effect of s-nitroso-N-acetyl-penicillamine (SNAP) and sodium nitrite on the ischemic heart was investigated in rats with hibernating and non-hibernating tendencies. The changes in the activity of the heart under in vivo conditions of experimental tests were also determined. The results showed that the in vivo inhibitory effect of SNAP on the ischemic-reperfused heart of hibernating animals was greater than that of nonhibernating animals. The studies of the heart of hibernators and nonhibernators under in vivo conditions confirmed a significant difference in the characteristics of hibernators' and nonhibernators' hearts subjected to ischemia-reperfusion injury. The results suggest that the antioxidative system of a hibernator's heart is more sensitive to a local ischemia-reperfusion injury than that of the nonhibernator's heart. Police also said nearly 39 percent of the double digit numbers of rapes were committed by men employed by crime groups to protect local officials and other "powerful people." Authorities have found the men can be introduced as pizza delivery drivers, barbers or foreign exchange students. The data also shows that more than a third of robberies committed by organized criminal groups last year were carried out for protection. The Russian Interior Ministry and Federal Investigative Committee said the data provides "an interesting insight into the capabilities of criminals
